Penny's Father Didn't Laugh

If it had not been for a crooked grocery-man, J.C. Penney might have become the owner of a grocery store rather than the owner of a dry goods chain and a leading merchandiser.

When he was a teenager, Jim worked for a grocery-man in Hamilton, Missouri. He liked the work and had plans to make a career of it. One night he came home and proudly told his family about his "foxy" employer. The grocer had a practice of mixing low quality coffee with the expensive brand and thus increasing his profit. Jim laughed as he told the story at the supper table.

His father didn't see anything funny about the practice. "Tell me," he said, "if the grocer found someone palming off an inferior article on him for the price of the best, do you think he would think they were just being foxy, and laugh about it?"

Jim could see his father was disappointed in him. "I guess not," he replied. "I guess I just didn't think about it that way."

Jim's father instructed him to go to the grocer the next day, collect whatever money due him and tell the grocer he wouldn't be working for him any longer. Jobs were not plentiful in Hamilton, but Mr. Penney would rather his son be unemployed than be associated with a crooked businessman.

J.C. Penney came that close to becoming a grocer.

Father, use your influence for only good!
